
nce there were two animals, a fox and a hound. They came from different families, and were supposed to hate each other. Romeo, the fox, was a Montague, and Juliet, the hound, was a Capulet.

ne day, the fox and the hound happened to both be playing in the woods.

When they noticed each other, they started to play and instantly became friends.

As time went on, they continued to meet up and became best friends.

- We'll always be friends forever, won't we?
- Yeah, forever.

As they grew up together,
they stayed good friends.

While both the fox and the hound were aware of their differences, it wasn't really a problem.

As they got older, the differences in their families made it harder for them to be friends.

The hound's family was focused around hunting the fox's family, adding conflict to their relationship.

While both the fox and the hound cared about their families, they didn't want to let them ruin their friendship.

The fox and the hound finally decided their friendship was too important to throw away and lived happily ever after
